After a two-year stint in the military, Helma started using alcohol and prescription drugs. She was sent to prison after she sold methamphetamines. With no income, she was homeless, she was in debt to The Salvation Army. Two years later she got treatment in a residential treatment program. She became healthier, she became independent, she learned how to do things for herself. She now works at a local grocery store, and lives in her own apartment.

Tanya enrolled in The Salvation Army’s substance abuse rehab program for women. She received group therapy, individual counseling, transportation assistance, and child care. She attended substance abuse workshops and life-skills classes, took anger management classes and building healthy relationships. Now she’s a wife and mother of three. She enjoys the time she gets to spend with her children.

Crisis tore down her life. Despite her best efforts, she was unable to get her life back together. She began attending a substance abuse program and a professional addiction rehab program. She found a new perspective on life. She’s now a proud and happy mother of three. She’s grateful for the opportunity to share the holiday with others.
